Talk chat video download

As a freshman in college in year 20, I struggled mightily to remember paying my 400-minute monthly cell phone bill. I was trying to maintain a long-distance relationship with my boyfriend, but our time to speak was limited due to my packed baseball schedule, my two jobs, and, most of all, the fact that we had only dated for a month before heading to different schools. She is now my husband — so it all works — but then we needed to be able to know each other in a world that seemed to stand up against us. Thankfully, that changed when a colleague introduced me to a free online video chatting company. I don't remember the name of the company, and I'm sure it's long since been extinct and has been replaced by new developments, but back then it opened up my world in ways I had dreamed possible. It gave me the chance to spend hours talking with my boyfriend face-to-face — even though we lived more than 200 miles. While I'd like to think my relationship will survive nine months apart even if the video chat hadn't been around, there's no way to know for sure. What I do know is that the video chat industry continues to revolutionize the way people interact on both a personal and professional level, and it remains a key part of my life as an online entrepreneur. Although it has come a long way since its infancy at the turn of the millennium, I am constantly surprised by how people so often fail to make the most of it. Popular video chat services are many video chat services, but the following are the most popular: Skype Skype is mostly free video chat, file sharing and instant-messenger service owned by Microsoft. It is quite possibly one of the most used, most well known bunch. Computer calling from computer is free, but if you want to make a mobile phone or landline call from your Skype service, you'll have to pay the fee. For United States customers, these charges range from $3 to $14 per month. I use Skype to host video interviews with guests from around the world for a weekly podcast. Google Hangouts Google Hangouts is a little buggy, but an excellent option for individuals who want to hold large, private conference calls, or who want to stream interviews directly on a YouTube channel from the video chat function. For example, when I helped host the Big Well Summit Online Conference series (enabling towards health and wellness bloggers and focusing on blog design, branding and development), we held our live interview panels through Google Hangouts. Our viewers can watch and participate by joining YouTube, Google Hangouts, or the Blog Well Summit website (owning and operating Google YouTube), enabling Hangout leaders to link their accounts and stream live hangouts from YouTube.. Hangout leaders also have a live on any website Can embed, as we did with our blog well summit interview panels. Google Hangouts are currently free. FaceTime was Apple's answer to FaceTime video chat services. Announced in 2010 and officially launched in 2011, Gyaa, The Apple device enables users to join one video chat, as long as their iOS device has a forward-facing camera. FaceTime is free whenever you're connected to WiFi, but data charges apply when you use it on a cellular data network. Video chat makes the world a seemingly small space because of improving quality video chat. In 2005, I was interviewing for a job in a different state, and the potential employer went to great lengths to establish a video conference job interview so we could chat in person before going along in further process. We both had to work with local community colleges to arrange conference rooms where we could hook up in campuses' Internet service and use our cameras for chat. Today, of course, this will not be an issue. In fact, in 2010 I participated in another cross-state job interview and had no problem connecting and chatting with a potential employer via Skype. Video chatting makes it possible to stay in touch with friends and family, connect with business partners and create a host meet-up with people you've never met. Not a week goes by where I don't use video chat for one reason or another, and because my work depends on it, my husband and I have mastered the science of high-quality video chat. In fact, we look awesome on camera that I've always gotten so good at getting praise on our setup. While it's possible to achieve with sub-par video quality, the quality of your conversations, your level of professionalism, and even the business opportunities you offer can expand when you improve it. Think of the halo effect. In short, the idea is that when one makes a favorable or adverse effect of something or something, that notion is transferred to other, unrelated aspects of that person or thing. For example, if you visit a website that is beautifully designed and easy to navigate, you can assume that the content is also of high quality, even if it's not necessary. On video chat, if your picture is clear and your audio is good, people at the other end are more likely to assume that you've done your act together and are interested in what they're saying. Clearly, the halo effect is not infallible. You can still screw things up by saying something petty or failing to prepare for your online meeting. However, when you improve the quality of your video, you tilt the scales to your side. How to enhance video quality fortunately, increasing your video quality is surprisingly easy. Use the following tips to wow the person at the other end of the connection. 1. Hd webcams invest in low quality, built-in webcams, leaving you with a grainy, low-light look. A few years ago, my husband and I bought a $99 external HD webcam from Logitech (same Currently available for around $75), and this significantly improved our video chat clarity. External webcams may not be ideal if you are chatting on a mobile device, but they are quite small Clips to a laptop or desktop, and they can make a real difference in your video. 2. Pay attention to back-lighting A surefire way to hurt the quality of your video is to sit with your back in window or bright light. When the light is shining towards your back and in the camera lens, it makes everything in the foreground - that's what you are - show darkness. By changing your computer so you're side-lit or front-lit, you can significantly improve your picture. 3. Give yourself a background camera love reference. Leaning against a wall while chatting online may feel comfortable, but it makes it harder for the person at the other end of the conversation to draw visual perspective. Try choosing a wall or background that offers some contrast without being overly busy — but, more importantly, provide space between your body and the background. Consider chatting in a location that's a few feet away from a wall with something visually interesting on it, like a piece of artwork. Just remember that if your desk or floor is visible in the background, go ahead and make sure your space is neat and tidy. 4. When appropriate, the light really good video consists of a theme bathed in natural light that originates from behind the camera. Setting up your chat in front of an open, sunny window is a way to achieve this effect, but if you have a hard time controlling the light at your location, you can always create fake natural lighting. Since many of our business conversations are organized via Google Hangouts and Skype, my husband and I decided to invest in softbox lighting kits. Our three costs $200 for a full set of professional lights, but if video chat isn't a major part of your business, you can probably get away with some well-placed lamps that you already have at home. 5. Make sure you have a good connection, I'll never forget a Skype interview I hosted, where the person at the other end installed their computer on a shared connection in a busy Starbucks. Her connection was poor, her video kept cold, and the background noise was so distracting that it was hard to hear what she had to say. At all costs, try hosting your video calls through a personal, high-speed Internet connection that will not be subject to the bandwidth usage of shared Internet users. Also, close any other program that can interfere with the bandwidth needed to maintain high-quality calls. For example, downloading files while video chatting is not a good idea. Finally, understand that cable internet companies generally only promise download speeds up to the level you're paying. So if you are paying for a speed of 10 Mbps, you can only get one or two Mbps during peak times of the day. This is because cable lines are usually shared - if everyone on your block goes home and 6 p.m. on Monday I Netflix starts streaming, the download speed decreases for everyone. If you're using cable internet, try or consider scheduling your video chat during non-peak times For a faster internet speed. When I started working full-time at home, I realized that our 10 Mbps service was no longer cutting it — when we upgraded to 50 Mbps, and now we've been downright spoiled by 300 Mbps. Use wired internet connection You almost always get better internet speeds when you are plugged into a wired internet connection. These protect you from the finicky nature of some wireless connections that kick you offline without warning. When my husband and I started getting serious about our podcast back in March, we knew we had to install a dedicated computer with a wired internet hookup. While we had rearranged the location of our router, it was well worth it — after more than 100 interviews, we haven't lost a single video call (at least on our end). Maximizing your online presence doesn't look as good on almost any video as they do in real life. The camera washes you and squashes you from 3D to 2D, and it doesn't always play well on your skin. So, even though I don't wear regular make-up, I almost always put something on before hosting a video chat. Also, I can see myself in video playback when I'm talking to someone else and if I don't like the way I look, it can be distracting. Here are a couple of ways I pump volume on my appearance. I don't go so far as to layer on makeup to the point where it looks completely unnatural, but because I've put on more than I normally want to wear, I finally made the feeling. Don't worry, though - this exaggerated effect is actually played on camera. I am a woman, but these tips can work for people too, especially during professional online meetings when attendance is most important. 7. Wear a foundation I am an IT cosmetics fanatic, and I love my Festive Foundation lights powder. Because it's a powder foundation, it's practically more impossible to apply or miss a place — perfect for people or girls who aren't used to wearing makeup. Subtle lights adds a glow to the skin that really pops up on camera. Also, it evens out skin tone and hides fine lines and wrinkles very effectively. You don't need to use IT cosmetics to achieve the same effect - just use the foundation you best respond to based on your age, skin type and natural color. The key here is to create a single color, so feel free to experiment with tinted moisturizer, liquid foundation, or powder foundation. 8. Shelter at your crease go ahead and apply your favorite shelter to your under-eye circles and spots, but go a step further and put something on the crease around your nose and mouth. I love it under cosmetics' goodbye eye concealer because it's thicker than other concealer, and it wrinkles that otherwise May appears on but does a great job of the evening. Not to mention, a little long way to go - I found a tube a few years ago that I'm still using. 9. Use bronzer as the camera washes you, it's up to you to create a facial shape. Apply a bronzer across you With the ridge of your nose, and follow your jaw line to help create dimensions. 10 wear a little more makeup than usual I don't wear my makeup much because I still want to look natural, but I add a dab more color to the apple of my cheeks, coat lipstick and lip gloss and wear eyeliner and mascara. If you wear a fair amount of regular make-up, it's a good idea to ramp it up a bit for the camera in order to look like yourself. 11. Do your hair here there is no reason to go over the water, but you should do something with your hair so that it looks like you have made an effort. If you're like me, you're constantly battling fly-away and bedheads. Consider buying over-the-ear sets of headphones-bulker headbands and headphones do wonders for masking hair problems. 12. Wear a plain top that is unlike your skin and background You want the person at the other end of the video chat to pay attention to your face, not for the wild print on top of it. Similarly, you don't want to wear a shirt too close in tone for your skin or background because you don't want to fade into your surroundings. Choose a color that contrasts well so you pop from the screen. Just keep the cut and design simple. 13. Dress up for the occasion if you are attending an online job interview, wear a suit. If you're hanging out with friends, wear what you normally want to wear socially. If you're meeting a love interest for the first time, dress up well and show off your assets without going over the water. Just because you're at home in bed doesn't mean you should wear your pajamas when video chat. 14. Wear suitable pants I know there is a strong temptation when chatting online for a suit top pair with running shorts because the person at the other end of the chat can't see under your waist. Believe me, I understand the temptation. The problem is, you never know when you might have to stand up and do something while streaming the video, alerting the other viewer to your top business, down party attire. I have a few pairs of black pants that look like business attire, but really stretch yoga pants that I just keep on hand for these occasions. I have two final, and incredibly important tips for looking at your best camera. 15. Don't mess with your look as you can watch your own video feed during your online chat, you can see every single hair that falls out of place. Avoid the temptation to mess with your hair, clothing or makeup while on camera. The most distracting video I've ever seen was the one where the woman was constantly playing with her hair and calling attention to her bangs. You won't do it because you won't be able to see yourself - don't do it when chatting online. Put yourself together before you start streaming, then accept whatever you look like during your chat. 16. Look at the camera, not the screen it took a lot of practice, but it's something I Got great - I only look at The computer screen when the person at the other end is talking. When it's my turn to speak, I turn my eyes straight to the camera so that people on the other side of the conversation get the impression that I'm looking them in the eyes. If you look at your screen instead of the camera, it might look as if you're looking down with the person you're related to. Don't ignore the audio because it's for you to look good on camera, it's equally important — possibly more important — that your voice is clear and comprehensible. You can easily improve your audio by investing in a set of headphones with an external microphone. It provides better sound and is likely to take your computer's microphone cut down on background noise. In addition, the use of headphones helps to reduce speaker response. If you're not wearing headphones while chatting online, your external microphone raises the other person's voice from the speakers and creates a feedback loop. It is distracting and really difficult to edit out if you happen to attend a professional interview. Go for headphones with a built-in external microphone. You can pick up a pair for under $50 from Amazon, such as the Saids stereo gaming headset with a microphone that costs about $30. We actually use a different external microphone, so my headphones — the i-Mego Throne Cambo headphones — don't have a built-in mic, but I absolutely love them. A couple costs $80, but it's not the only pair I've found that ultimately gives me a headache from wearing extended. The last word if you haven't yet jumped on the video chat bandwagon, it's just a matter of time. Whether you skype with your kids while they're away in college, FaceTime with your best friend while he travels abroad, or participates in Google Hangouts as part of an online workout program, video chatting is becoming the norm for building a long-distance relationship. Make your experience the best by proving the quality of your video chat today. Do you often use online video chat? How do you maximize the experience? experience?
